Offering an intensely detailed view of mundane objects and landscapes, German photographer Andreas Gefeller’s large color photographs from his ongoing series Supervisions depict a whole world of architecture hidden in plain sight. Compromised of a variety of exaggerated, close up views of urban spaces - graffiti clad city walls, drop ceilings, sandy beaches, swimming pools, and parking lots in Dusseldorf, Tokyo, New York and Miami - Gefeller redefines our perception of common place scenes and settings through his metohodical scans. His topographic representations seem unreal, yet retain a documentary liek feel, transporting the view to a new dimension through his “birds eye” perspective. The artist has a distinct ability to transform straightforward landscapes, in this case, a vision of traces in the sand, and heighten them into scenes at once abstract and startlingly revealing.
